He is 28 by the despairing cries of the other fifteen or so 29 who share the room, which is illuminated by a single electric bulb hanging from the ceiling, just out of reach.

There is no warmth 30 him, so for much of the day he sits on the stone floor in his ragged, threadbare clothes, clasping his knees 31 to his thin body and burying his head; there are moments of fury as well, when he 32 his pale, scarred face with his fists or beats his head 33 one of the walls. At other times he simply sits there, rocking relentlessly backwards 34 forwards, his wide open, jet-black eyes staring feverishly at the grey concrete walls and at a terrifying, endless 35 as bleak as despair itself.
