Staying Green: Buy local products

Nowadays, it may take about 1,500 miles for an average meal to travel from the farm to your plate. Food is often transported great distances to be processed and then sent to various locations. Buying local food helps the environment by saving oil and reducing greenhouse gas emissions. It supports the local economy and protects the small family farmer. Whenever possible, you should buy local food from community retailers or farmer's markets. Another reason to buy locally is that fresh food tastes and looks better, as it has more vitamins and nutrients than food that has been transported. It is known that fresh fruits and vegetables lose their nutritional value the longer they are stored. Think about how much better you would feel if you ate produce that was grown locally, rather than if your food has already traveled 1,500 miles before you buy it.

_____ 1. Before food reaches your plate, it may need to travel for a 1500-mile distance.

_____ 2. It is not common today that food is transported great distances before we eat it.

_____ 3. Buying local food is good for the local economy.

_____ 4. Food that has been in storage loses its nutritional value.

_____ 5. Local food has more artificial coloring in it.
