For capital punishment

Capital punishment is a legal form of punishment in Taiwan, the Republic of China. Before 2000, Taiwan had a relatively high execution rate when some strict laws were still in effect in the harsh political environment. However, after some controversial cases during the 1990s plus some officials' attitude towards abolition, the number of executions dropped significantly, with only three executions in 2005 and none between 2006 and 2009. Execution resumed in 2010 after strong pro-capital punishment activities burst out earlier that year.

Minister of Justice Wang Ching-feng's resignation has toughed off a public debate over whether Taiwan should abolish the death penalty. She stepped down because she would not sign an order for execution of those convicts on the death row. Convinced that capital punishment violates human rights, she has been campaigning for the abolition of the death penalty. She vowed not to sign one single death warrant while in office.

From time immemorial, the Homo sapience had to cull black sheep to maintain peace and order in society. Different nations have gradually conceived the idea of ending capital punishment in their own time. Most of the Judeo-Christian countries have abolished the death penalty, but Judaism at first demanded an eye for an eye. As a matter of fact, Moslem peoples still insist on capital punishment for murderers and offenders of other blackest crimes. So are most of the peoples in Asia, including those of us in Taiwan.
